I...read more What Black Holes Are Made Of Ever since theoretical physicists first suggested the existence of black holes, they've become a staple of sci-fi and Hollywood blockbusters. But how do black holes actually work? Toward the end of elementary school, many children learn the formula for black hole energy: $E=mc^2$ This equation is a well-known, albeit high-school-level, equation for explaining the relationship between mass and energy. In other words, it tells us that a mass equivalent to the energy that would be produced by a certain quantity of mass-energy (i.e., mc^2) will collapse to a point known as a black hole. This point of no return, for reasons that will shortly become clear, is often referred to as the event horizon. As theoretical physicists often emphasize, black holes are difficult to observe because they represent a place where not even light can escape. As a result, the only thing that physicists know about them is information provided by theory and computer simulations. Most scientists agree that black holes should exist, but they disagree on how big they are. Some say that they are small enough to be regarded as test particles, while others say they are extremely massive. But since black holes cannot be directly measured, they have proved difficult to definitively confirm or refute. Until recently, we knew black holes only through their gravitational effects on other objects. During the 1960s, a group of physicists led by Stephen Hawking came up with the idea that black holes should emit radiation from their event horizons that falls into them, as their gravitational energy is gradually converted to heat. Black hole radiation has been tested only indirectly. Years of study have shown that the universe consists of matter and energy. This includes radiation such as light and energetic particles. But the question remains, how much radiation is there and where does it go? There are four types of radiation in the universe, and every type of black hole emits all four. The first three types are known as classical: gamma, X-ray and ultraviolet radiation. If a quantum field is whipped around a black hole, each quantum of the field can be assigned a frequency (i.e., a certain energy or wavelength). The radiation has a similar physical property to light, which means that it can be seen and measured. The radiation is specific for each type, and the one emitted by a given black hole depends on the mass of the black hole.

What's new:

in Darkness Deathdays End in Darkness is a historical-fantasy novel by Helen Lowe, published by Virgin Books in June 2007. At its heart lies the life of the love behind Brian Boru, legendary King of Ireland, who faced the might of a divided country in order to save his people from the threat of the Vikings. Plot introduction Story begins with Brian Boru, King of Ireland, holding his patrimony of Ulster high in the air until, in 1175, in a series of raids and battles, Sigurd of Orkney and others bring slaughter to the Irish lands. The Irish kings King Fiacha and Brian Boru fight for their very lives to save their people and bring peace to the land. Brian Boru concludes the peace treaty, his sister holds hostage in a convent of Irish nuns, and he departs Ireland for the last time to avoid death and leaves his sister to this future. Brian Boru retires in Dublin, and after taking on Ireland's first knight, the Irish make him Abbot of Clonmacnoise in 1181. The greatest of the St. Bernard heroes was Hugh of Puente Piquer. Brian Boru's mother was a daughter of Hugh, and on his deathbed, the saint came to him and said he was named Brian Boru in the tradition of his house and was destined to come to a good end, but he admonished him to ensure he made certain decisions. The nonfiction books used on the events and figures in this novel are Peter Tremlett's The Dog and the Angel: Fathers and Sons in Poitou and Brian Boru's Life by Orkney men of Ireland. Characters Main characters Brian Boru: King of Ireland and High King of Ireland. The son of Gruffudd of Wales and Ciara Ferba, his "dawn of manhood" was 23 years of age upon meeting his future wife, where he was chosen by Hugh of Puente Piquer, an Irish abbot. Brian Boru was renowned, a ruler of peace and justice whose people held him sacred and whose reign produced a revival in arts and learning. He is called "The Perfect," whose empire was twice the size of the previous kingdom of Ireland. He ruled his kingdom until '1177, when he loses his life, where he leaves his kingdom for an abbey in Ireland. Gráinne Ní Mór: Albeit mother of five, she was
