The purpose of this chapter is to review and critically examine in vitro studies of three major classes of biological oxidation reactions that are relevant to the stability of lubricants. The reactive sites for these transformations are fats, cholesterol, and proteins. The three areas of research, in vitro model systems, mechanism, and kinetic studies are briefly discussed. Included are attempts to correlate in vitro and in vivo toxicological data for these reactive classes. The mechanisms suggested by in vitro studies of lubricant oxidation are then considered. The general conclusion is that the in vitro models produce consistent and 6d1f23a050
