Assume a function: def foo(arg1, arg2 = None): # do something with arg1 and arg2 Is there a way to pass arg1 and arg2 to foo without having to define them on the function's argument list? Instead of: foo(arg1, arg2 = None) How can I pass in arg1 and arg2 as a tuple? foo((arg1, arg2 = None)) Is there some reason I should not do this, or is it a sign that I have a design flaw? A: Is there a way to pass arg1 and arg2 to foo without having to define them on the function's argument list? It's not possible, because it will be impossible for someone to guess what arg1 and arg2 should be. You could define them in the function, but then you could just as well write them in the function signature instead. Instead of 6d1f23a050
